How Shakespeare Repeats Himself.

Shakespeare has a habit of repeating himself. Sydney Smith complained to Constable that in every novel of Scott's, from Guy Mannering to The Fortunes of Nigel, there occurred a Meg Merrilies. "She is good," he said, "but good too often." In a similar way Shakespeare constantly introduces his heroine disguised as a man, and his utterly selfish there is the "flower-like young of Measure for Measure; Well that Ends Well. It is possible that Shakespeare was much impressed by the stupid pride, levity, and heartlessness of the young noblesse; he was obliged to make heroes of them, but he shows them for heroes very unheroic. They are almost always unworthy of the love with which women persecute them. From "Venus and Adonis' onward, Shakespeare treats, and not without liking the pursuit by the woman of the man. The circumstance occurs frequently enough in life, but it is never agreeable to watch. Every one would prefer the worm in the bud to feed on the damask cheek rather than

" Venue tonde entiere a la proie attachee," as Helena attaches herself to Bertram A character in many ways so admirable is debased when Helena becomes a orampon. English has no word so engeliant, but the French supply a phrase. In brief, as Dr. Hudson remarks, All's Well that Ends Well "is more apt to inspire an apologetic than an enthusiastic tone of mind."-Andrew Lang's in Harper's Magazine
